We know that today the study of foreign languages is very developed. And learning English is at the first level. Young people in different regions of the world are interested in learning English. The shadowing method helps a lot not only in learning English, but also in learning other languages. This method can be learned to speak English like native speakers.

Shadowing is a learning language technique developed by the American Professor Alexander Arguelles.

To put it simply, shadowing is a learning technique in which you listen to someone speaking in your target language and then repeat what they say. The goal is to replicate their pronunciation and intonation as best they can. For example, if students want to speak in an American accent they have to listen some American speakers and repeat what they say right after them without any delay. This will help students' ears recognize unique rhythms of that particular accent and remember them. By the way, shadow helps students develop two skills at the same time: listening and talking. Listening to the native speaker, they learn to distinguish features of the pronunciation of individual sounds and whole phrases. At the same time it also helps Uzbek students A1, A2 level to learn new vocabulary and also a good method for learning the alphabet properly. One of the most common mistakes among students is failing to learn the foreign language's alphabet.

Shadowing has several types. First one is "Natural" (no-interference)-To observe the natural way of performing a specific activity. Advantages of this gives users more flexibility and the chances of determining criticality will be high. Second one is "Controlled"-Get Insight into a specific journey. Advantages of this is an observation examination technique for the researcher, as they can guide the steps that must be taken when carrying out the activities. Third one is "Participatory"-Gain a firsthand perspective. Advantages of this gives the researcher a chance to see things from the users perspective and can lead to developing greater empathy as well as a great rapport between the researcher and participant.

This method is very useful in the study of languages. This method would be very effective and interesting. It is much more convenient and easy to learn English by watching interesting videos of native speakers than by doing various hilarious boring exercises.
